Not illustrated. 1920 Excerpt: ...or six hundred millions of goods in excess of what she receives from us, merely in order to pay the interest on her debt to this country. Consequently, instead of continuing to send abroad some three or four thousand millions a year in excess of our imports, as we have been doing, we may keep our whole product at home besides having it supplemented for us to the extent of five or six hundred millions from abroad. This is equal to an addition of from 3,500 to 4,500 millions of goods each year to our own stock in this country, provided the production of goods in this country is not reduced. On the other hand, the labor situation is such that production may be reduced by an amount at least equal to our saving in exports. Of course, if labor gets wholly out of hand, almost anything may happen, but I suspect that our large producers are quite willing to have production reduced at a time when our foreign market is cut off by Europes inability to pay for our goods, and therefore that concessions will be made to labor to whatever extent may be necessary to keep production at such a point as will cause prices to approximate the figure that will yield the best returns to industry. V The Relation Between the Two Factors It would seem, therefore, that since the quantity of purchasing power in terms of money is likely to increase some 25 per cent, and the quantity of goods is likely to remain, for the time, more or less stationary, we should look for an increase in prices of about 25 per cent above their present level before the maximum is reached. But rising prices may stimulate production; if so, the increase in goods may check the rise in price, so that prices instead of rising 25 per cent above present levels, may be checked after a rise
