

God vs. Chance: On Which Should You Gamble Your Soul?

Only a fool would gamble away his life savings without knowing his chances of winning. But what about the gamble you are taking by deciding whether or not to believe in God? The stakes could not be higher. They are your life, and perhaps even your very soul. But are the odds in your favor? Should you place your bets on God, some other form of intelligence, or chance? A matter this serious needs to be approached sensibly, and that is just what this book does. It asks the question, Which of these is the most probable explanation for our existence? and then weighs the odds for and against each one. As you read this fascinating book, you will discover:

The surprising reason why mainstream science simply cannot give you an unbiased answer to this question. (You may be shocked to find out!) Why so many scientists suspect there is a reality outside of our universe! What my math professor knew to be true, but was too frightened to write. The amazing reasons why the DNA code is a language. The tantalizing hints we now have about how complex the very first self-replicator needed to have been. The odds that life could have formed by chance within our universe. (You really ought to know the answer to this vital question!) Why it takes just as much faith to believe in an infinite universe as it does to believe in God if not more! Why the popular science media is flat out wrong when they tell you that the universe must be infinite because it is flat. (Pun intended.) How bad mutations win the battle hands-down over good mutations in new computer simulations. How Darwin's tree of life is missing when we perform genetic sequence comparisons! The reasons why intelligent, educated, thoughtful people find harmony between the Bible and science. Why our universe could not have created itself from nothing. The false presumptions behind Richard Dawkins probabilistic argument against

God. Why there must have been a beginning, and therefore a first cause. Why God must have been the first cause. Why the anthropic multiverse does not hold up against God as an explanation for our universe. (The reasons for this might surprise you!) A concise summary of evidential, probabilistic, and logical reasons to believe that there is a God. Rusty Entrekin has a B.A in theology from Louisiana College, which has been furthered by a lifetime love of reading, popular science, apologetics, and contemplation. When scientists venture to proclaim that there is no God, Rusty said, they are venturing outside of science into metaphysics, the realm of theologians and philosophers. In the process, I believe these atheistic scientists are making philosophical and theological errors, and ignoring evidence that clearly points to a Creator, so I felt the need to present the case for the defense. I hope that this book will enable people who have despaired of believing in God to find assurance once again that He does indeed exist. Rusty lives in Kennesaw, Georgia with his wife Julie and the three youngest of their seven children, where he enjoys hiking, creating music with his guitar, and writing apologetics and theological articles for his two websites, ThingsToCome.org and BeNotConformed.org.
