Not illustrated. 1906 Excerpt: ... In a recent discussion before the New York Surgical Society, Stimson said: The generally accepted idea was that after one attack of suppurative appendicitis, sufficient changes were set up in the neighborhood to render the patient exempt from the risk of further attacks. Two cases had occurred to him recently, however, that indicated that this was not necessarily the case, since one patient, after what had been undoubtedly two attacks of suppurative inflammation, presented himself for the cure of a resulting hernia, and on operation it was found that the appendix was free within the peritoneal cavity and practically devoid of adhesions. Bryant and Fowler fully corroborated Stimson's statement, that frequently after an attack of suppurative appendicitis the appendix was as fully capable of originating another attack as formerly. Rushmore was of the opinion that such cases did occasionally occur. I have quoted this in full, because it gives quite clearly the two opposite views held by the profession upon this point at the present time. To my question, Have you seen a recurrence in any form after the appendix has been excised? I received one answer in the affirmative. Morris writes: Yes, where more than one inch of the appendix was left in. A few cases have been reported of second attacks after the appendix had been removed, usually the result of improper treatment of the stump. THE REMOTE COMPLICATIONS AND AFTER-EFFECTS. A patient may have entirely recovered, to all appearances, from the immediate effects and complications of the disorder; still he is in danger of having certain other sequelae develop at any time in the future. The remote after-effects which are most frequently seen are an obstruction of the bowels in its various forms from adhesions, ...
